This dissertation is an examination of how police officers' perceptions of the complexity in merging Organizational Change Components (OCCs) related to the consolidation of the Louisville Division of Police (LDP) and Jefferson County Police Department (JCPD) in 2003 impact support for police consolidation. This study focused on five primary OCCs: 1) culture(s), 2) policies and procedures, 3) communications, 4) collective bargaining contracts, and 5) re-defining patrol division boundaries. The population consisted of officers who were currently employed by the Louisville Metro Police Department (LMPD) and were affiliated with either the former LDP or the JCPD in 2003 when these departments were merged to form LMPD. The entire population of 669 police officers was invited to participate in this study and complete a survey. The survey resulted in 390 respondents, a 58.2% response rate. Police officers hired post-consolidation were not included in the population for this study. The dissertation was divided into six chapters comprising monocentrism and polycentrism, history of the LMPD consolidation, diffusion of innovation theory, and complexity theory. Chapter I provides an overview of the study. Chapter II explores monocentric and polycentric forms of government and police departments. It also focuses on diffusion of innovation theory in consolidation efforts and how complexity plays a significant part of innovation. Chapter III gives an overview of the merger of the LDP and JCPD. This chapter further explores the nature of the OCCs used in merging the two police agencies. Chapter IV, V, and VI cover the methods utilized, findings, and discussion of the findings respectively. A stepwise regression analysis was conducted utilizing current support for consolidation as the dependent variable. Six models were tested. The findings indicate that officers' perception of the complexity of merging OCCs was a significant predictor of current support for consolidation. Additionally, officers' prior support for consolidation and officers' satisfaction with the results of the merged OCCs were also significant predictors of current support for merger. In comparison, prior support was the strongest predictor of current support followed by satisfaction.

This report is an exploratory study of the employment of off-duty police officers for police duties in the private sector focuses on the major organizational and management issues involved in letting officers be privately employed, uniformed, and with full police powers. Study data came from 13 selected county and municipal police departments from several areas of the country. Secondary employment is an accepted practice in all the police departments. Some departments permit private employers to rent police vehicles and other police services as well. The departments have similar rules and practices concerning secondary employment, but each department has evolved its own method of organizing and managing this employment. The major difference among departments is whether their organization conforms to an officer contract or a department contract system of secondary employment. The departments all forbid officers from owning a private security firm or brokering the employment of fellow officers. Policy and management issues involved in secondary employment include legal liability, conflict of interest, misconduct and misuse of authority, the handling of complaints, and off-duty court attendance. Public police have an advantage over private police in both their greater formal authority and their greater informal powers. The officer contract system requires less organization and administration than does the department contract system. However, municipalities with 100,000 or more residents seem to be shifting toward the department contract system, which appears to be a more rational way to allocate staff when private demand for police service exceeds the supply.
